In the frigid air high above the Arctic Ocean, an American C-17 carrying a cutting-edge laser of immense power successfully shoots down a ballistic missile nearly 400 miles away. Before the celebration can begin, the aircraft goes dark, vanishing off radar into the mist at the top of the world.

As the details emerge it becomes obvious that the aircraft has been hijacked, the crew murdered at their stations. It's last known heading would have taken it directly to Russia, but the CIA insisted it never arrived. An odd signal suggests it crashed into the Arctic Ocean halfway between Norway and the North Pole. In a tense meeting the President asks how deep the waters are in that area. Not deep enough, is the answer.

Russian ships put out to sea. Chinese vessels are spotted north of Norway. The only American asset is a small research vessel operated by NUMA. Kurt Austin and Joe Zavala lead the search, only to discover the great nations of the world being manipulated by a single man with a deadly plan of revenge.

Departure(s)

Julian Barnes

Shortly after our narrator, a writer named Julian, begins this book by discussing the workings of involuntary memory, he interrupts himself with a bulletin to the 'There will be a story – or a story within the story – but not just yet'.

Of course, whether Departure(s) is mostly a fictional story or not, there is a lot of its author in it, including Barnes's reckoning with the blood disorder he has been living with since he was diagnosed in 2020, his long preoccupation with dying and grief, and his mordant sense of the indignities and lost opportunities we're prey to in love.

The story he promises to deliver is a love story, that of two friends he met at university in the 1960s. Julian played matchmaker to Stephen and Jean; as the third wheel, he was deeply invested in the success of their love and insulted when they broke up. Forty years later, he tries again, watching as their rekindled affair produces joys, betrayals and disappointments of a different order.

Contrapposto

Dave Eggers

Cricket Dib, born on the American prairie, has no particular prospects or ambitions until, in grade school, he realises he can draw. He soon meets a girl, Olympia Argyros, one year older, who is captivating and brilliant and far more worldly. Recognising his talent, she convinces Cricket to deface, with profound vulgarity, a popular playground. He does it willingly, and thus begins a 65-year entwining between Cricket and Olympia, encompassing friendship, working partnership and love affair. Together they go to art school – an experience of dubious value – and then navigate the art world for the next 50 years, together and apart.

Contrapposto is a moving and very funny novel about allies and art, and what it means to be an artist. All through their lives, Cricket sees Olympia as his soulmate and destiny, and while she is always his champion, romantically her eyes are always seeking something – and someone – else. Their love changes over the decades, but their commitment to each other, and their search for meaning in the making of art, never wanes.

The Last Kings of Hollywood

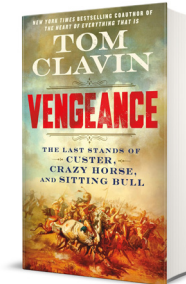

Coppola, Lucas, Spielberg – and the Battle for the Soul of American Cinema

Paul Fischer

In the summer of 1967, as the old Hollywood studio system was dying, an intense, uncompromising young film-school graduate named George Lucas walked onto the Warner Bros backlot for his first day working as an assistant to another up-and-coming, largely-unknown filmmaker, Francis Ford Coppola. At the exact same time, across town on the Universal Studios lot, a film-obsessed 20-year-old Steven Spielberg longed to break free from his apprenticeship to the struggling studio and become a film director in his own right.

Within a year, the three men would become friends. Spielberg, prioritising security, got his seven-year contract directing television. Lucas and Coppola, hungry for independence, left Hollywood for San Francisco to found an alternative studio, American Zoetrope, and make films without answering to corporate capitalism.

Based on extensive research and hundreds of original interviews, The Last Kings of Hollywood tells the thrilling, dramatic inside story of how, over the next 15 years, the three filmmakers rivalled and supported each other, fell out and reconciled, and fought to reinvent popular American cinema.

Burdened with protecting Adeline's identity, she faces growing complications when two men claim ties to the elderly woman – one accusing Adeline of involvement in a crime.

Another dilemma brews when Ivy's cousin, Gina, is detained at Ellis Island for lack of proper documentation. Hoping the immigration service can resolve the misunderstanding, Ivy seeks their help but is instead thrust into a dangerous world. With time running out, she must unravel the tangle of secrets linking Adeline's past, Gina's freedom and her own safety. Who can she trust, and how far will she go to protect those she loves?
